

HE WANTS THE WILL

Mr. J. W. Ransom Appears in the Brown Case.

NOW OLD JOCKEY PLANNED IT

He Hated the Haydens and Would Have Cut Them Off Altogether—Margaret Would Hand Up the Money.

The regular patrons of the Brown will didn't particularly enjoy themselves during the first part of yesterday morning's session, the time being taken up by readings from the diary of Jas. H. Brown. People grew weary of hearing "To home all day" and "Cash enters to the number of..." Even the long-enduring court staff grew tired of it, and suggested that a little variety be introduced, and the reading discontinued. Mr. Russell, who was in charge of the reading, then turned to the diary of Mrs. Brown, which was a great change to Mr. Brown. We claim that he was a careful, methodical man, and that there was no such change as the diary of Mrs. Brown. With these diaries which contain the real state of his mind, the effort is to establish that there was no change, to the satisfaction of the jury. Finally the judge called a halt, and the proposition's attorney noted an exception. The sheriff was directed to call witnesses Lockwood and Chamberlain, but neither was present.

The Court—Call Mr. Ransom, then. Proprietor's Attorney—We'll call Mr. Ransom, but we had wished to put the other witnesses on before Mr. Ransom was sworn.

The Court—Witnesses ought to be introduced to remain ready for call. Proprietor's Attorney—They have been, but it's quite impossible to keep them from running in and out unless manacles or fetters are put on them.

Mr. Ransom on the stand. The Hon. James W. Ransom was finally found and put on the stand. Mr. Ransom has lived in the city thirty-one years, is an attorney at law, and knew Brown from 1861 to his death. He was Brown's attorney from '61 to '82, and then became city attorney when he gave up his general practice.

This long association with Brown made witness acquainted with his methods and disposition. Brown was not easily influenced, as a rule, he followed his own ideas. His leading characteristic was a desire to accumulate property. He was close and economical in habits, almost parsimonious, and in his business relied almost entirely on his memory, never keeping any books. His memory was extraordinary; he was without education and physically was strong until old age undermined him. Nothing in his habits, conversation, or business practices showed the slightest indication of insanity. He had money, but he was frequently on the verge of being broke, and he was with many people and no indications were ever manifested.

The witness is one of the executors of Brown's will and he drafted that document. According to Mr. Ransom's best recollection Brown first spoke of making his will a year before it was actually drawn, but said nothing of what the provisions would be. About a month before the will was made he indicated what he desired to do with his property. He desired his money to be given to his wife and Mrs. Haines to have the rest. Mr. Ransom suggested a more liberal provision for his wife and he said that connection that he had $50,000 life insurance in her favor and that with $5,000 more he thought would be sufficient for her. Mr. Ransom spoke of the slender portion given Alice and Brown said that any money given her would be thrown away, that he had no business ability; that he had failed in everything he had attempted; that he and Alice were extravagant; that Alice was fond of society and if any money was given her it would be squandered.

Margaret Would Hand On. Of Mrs. Haines he said she was careful and business-like, and any money she received would be taken care of and added to Mr. Ransom thought Alice ought to be given $10,000 outright, but Brown wouldn't consent, and he was advised that she be given the interest on $10,000 for life, but he again insisted that she should have $10,000 outright. He said that he was sure she would draw up in accordance with his directions and as it appears, this disposition on the will was held in Mr. Ransom's office, and when Brown died, Mr. Ransom made a draft of the will. Brown called the next day, and he was with the draft and took it away to be copied. He brought the copy back, and Mr. Ransom declared it a fair copy and he took it out to have it witnessed. Mr. Brown being named as one of the executors objecting to appoint one of the witnesses. He said he would see the will again until Brown's death. The reason why Brown was chosen as one of the executors was because Brown thought he knew all of Brown's business affairs.

Mrs. Haines was chosen executor, and she was given a contract to draw up by which as executor he would be accountable to Mrs. Haines. Up to that time Mr. Ransom had never seen Mrs. Haines and she did not visit him at the office while the will was being discussed. The first time Mrs. Haines first saw him, Brown at Grandville where he was with Brown on a business matter. Brown was then said of the will. Witness had known Mr. Brown and Mrs. Haines for several years before the will was drawn.

How About a Law Suit. When the will was under consideration Brown spoke of Haydens' money, with whom he had business, and he said that he was not to be put against the testimony given by Haydens, Jr., on the law suit between the old man. At the time the will was made, witness thought Brown was worth about $75,000. The real estate owned by him in the city had doubled up in value since then. The house then was worth probably $25,000 and it is worth $50,000. Witness was in Detroit in the fall of '18 and Haydens asked witness of Brown's worth. He told him it was about $75,000. At the time when the will was under consideration did Brown speak of having talked with Mrs. Haines, but on the contrary he declared he did not want to have anything to do with her. He said nothing about his children, except that he wanted them to be taken care of, and said nothing of going right down to Mrs. Chamberlain's to tell her all about it. Witness had forgotten the existence of the contract by which he agreed to act as executor until it was produced after his death. He drew up the contract and Brown secured Mrs. Haines' signature to it, but witness did not know if Margaret had any knowledge of it or if it would be agreeable to Margaret for him to act. When the paper was brought back signed by Margaret, he felt sure that Brown had consulted her and that she wanted him to act. Witness admitted that Brown was hard to influence, but it depended somewhat on who exerted the influence. It is an easy offered a suggestion, even if it contradicted with his own views, he would probably change his views, but he took kindly to the suggestions of friends in whom he had confidence.

When Brown first spoke of the will he was determined that Alice should have nothing, but upon Mr. Ransom's suggestion he did make some provision for Alice. Mr. Ransom read the will over, and Mr. Ransom explained that the language in the document was his own, in accordance with Brown's instructions. Mr. Ransom said he never knew that Brown kept any money or currency in the house, but put it in the bank as soon after he got it as possible. The provision for Mrs. Hayden was also analyzed. Brown didn't want Alice to have any of his money until Hayden's death or until he couldn't support her, and then the money was to be divided according to the judgment of Margaret. Witness considered Mrs. Brown a most estimable and worthy woman and he never heard anything against her character until two years after the will was made when he visited his office and expressed the opinion that Alice was not his daughter, that Mrs. Brown had not been true to him. Witness told Brown never to say a word to him on that subject as he did not believe it. Brown said nothing of where he had obtained such an idea.

Now having arrived, court adjourned until 2 p. m. Monday. When the cross-examination of Mr. Ransom is finished, all of the testimony for the proposition will be in, and then the contestants will put in rebuttal evidence. It is said that a deposition by Dr. Seely of Chicago will be introduced, denying absolutely any intrigue between himself and Mrs. Brown as charged by Mrs. Haines. Mr. Hayden will go on the stand to show that he is not an extravagant spendthrift.
